I'd like to bring your attention to a portion of a world wide financial fraud, on my good name, forcing me to be its unwilling linchpin, and in part, operating out of at least one of your stores.

On November 13, 2025, I went to the Allsups # 102320, at 2021 N. Prince St., Clovis, to buy a money order. For ordinary people, that would be a mere errand. Don't you, yourself, simply make your purchases, and waltz on, with your life? Once upon a time, I used to be able to do that. No more. Unfortunately, due to ongoing fraud efforts against me, I am burdened to have to document every freaking aspect of any financial transaction I do. Thus, I did so, during the purchase of that money order.

The cashier who handled the sale, had no problem with that. Nor did another cashier, there, at the time, who was kind and helpful to other customers. That is the conduct of people who have nothing to hide. They thus raised no alarm.

However, a woman I don't know, who I initially assumed was a customer, stood behind me, the way one does, when waiting in a line, to make one's purchase. She demanded, "What are you doing?" She also objected to being recorded.

Well, I hadn't been recording her at all, until she began to make an issue of my being burdened to have to document every freaking financial transaction I ever do: Something no one not subjected to world wide financial fraud, making them an unwilling linchpin, ever has to do.

In fact, I hadn't even been aware of her presence, until she made an issue, of what was occurring. That's the conduct of someone who's real issue, is the documenting of what they are up to: not merely of a purchase transaction.

Next thing I knew, she was in the cashier area. So: a store employee. Not a customer. And, someone with access to tamper with the financial transaction machinery. And, someone whose job involved working in a daily environment with store security cams. So: Not in a reasonable position to expect privacy.

I laid out my cash payment for the money order. I arranged the bills to display their identifying numbers, as there had recent to that time, been an instance of siphoning, which had occurred at a location not connected with Allsups. The bill numbers may or may not, have been relevant. I took no chances, and so, laid them out that way.

You can view what occurred in the relevant video, which should accompany this document. I didn't know anyone's names, but as you read along and view, you'll understand my applied relevant nicknames. The conversation went about like this.

As I recorded the laid out cash payment, I said:

Here's $240. But, it's for $227 (a money order in the amount of $227.00.)

Cashier: Ready?
Yes.
He then picked up the cash on the counter top.

In the next part of the video, I overlaid a frame of Ms. Interrupter, to protect the privacy of the cashier, who was clearly in the video, at that point. That's because I was facing him, and Ms. Interrupter was behind me. So you can keep that in mind, with the frame. It correlates to her speech, surprising me from behind.

Behind me, Ms. Interrupter demands: What are you doing?
Assuming she was a customer waiting in line behind me, I answered: Oh! I'm buying a money order.

Since she seemed to be objecting, I turned around to see her: Who are you?
She ducks head, and moves away. No answer.

She fails to ID herself: Would you stop recording, please?

Odd, as I hadn't been recording her at all, until this point, when I learned she'd been behind me, during that time.

Committing fraud, while insisting that what one is up to, not be recorded, (by me: I won't get any organization's building cam footage) is a recurring PATTERN. Within the following folder, given for context and history, see the July 26, 2023 – Complaint re: Money Order at USPS Inc document.

At any rate, next thing I know, Ms. Interrupter appeared behind the store's cash register area. I've tried several photobomb removal and blur faces apps, to protect professional store staff Ms. Pink Sweatshirt's privacy, as she didn't object to being recorded, and did not otherwise alarm me. Unfortunately, none of those apps worked, in that regard. My apologies go out to her.

Friendly, helpful, professional Ms. Pink Sweatshirt, whose privacy I wanted to protect, motions welcomingly, and says to another customer: I'll get you over here.

To Ms. Interrupter, now behind the counter: So you work here?

I was incredulous. I'd thought Ms. Interrupter was an interrupting customer, before this point.

Yes, ma'am.
Why didn't you just say so?

Ms. Interrupter fails to admit why she kept this fact a deep, dark, slithering, furtive, secret, up until this point. Instead, she countered a question with a question: Why are you recording?

It was interesting that her issue seemed more to be about recording whatever she was trying to pull, in the transaction itself; rather than recording her. But I answered, anyway.

Because I'm burdened to have to do this, because people are committing crime against me. Otherwise, I'd rather not (have to)!

Thank You

The thanks was to the cashier, who had handed me change, and my money order, but not the receipt –- until prompted for it. I was not yet convinced he was involved in any criminal effort: He may have merely been new on the job. It's possible that under pressure, he made a gypping error. It may have been deliberate. But he didn't object to being recorded, so I've made an effort to protect his privacy.

However: Didn't Allsups formerly provide receipts which had the money order number included, on them? This one, didn't.

Twelve Dollars and one cent.

The cashier actually provided only $8.01; gypping me by $5. But there was too much going on, at the time, to deal with this particular siphon instance. That fact may have been intentionally orchestrated. Ms. Interrupter objected to videotaping in general: not merely of herself.

Please confirm the amount of my coin, (?) please. That's $227?
Yes. And I'll take a receipt.
Yes, ma'am. Here you go.
